He recalled that in 1992 the Committee had considered seven requests for the export of traditional glue, as well as one request for glue intended for the manufacture of cigarettes. In 1992, the Committee had authorized the export of 320 tons of glue worth $275,000, and rejected or deferred the export of 99.6 tons. In 1993, the Committee had so far rejected the export of 400 tons of glue and had still to take a decision on a request for the export of more than 2,310 tons of glue worth $2 million. There had therefore been a substantial increase in the quantities of the product requested.]

With regard to the proposal which had been made to use the criterion of quantity, his delegation was not in a position to take a stand on that subject. In order to be able to do so, the United Nations should have recourse to experts who would assess the needs of the Iraqi population in all areas. In the absence of such evaluations, the Committee would be obliged to consider rough estimates. Moreover, it was clear that any product could have industrial applications. In theory, therefore, the Committee could prohibit all products, thereby depriving the Iraqi population of those products of which it had greatest need. The United Nations was seeking to develop mechanisms and was sending numerous missions to Iraq to evaluate the situation there and to make proposals aimed at assisting the population. The Government of Iraq, which had mastered advanced technologies, could quite easily manufacture the fabrics necessary to clothe the population of Iraq. What the Committee was trying to do was to prevent the export of dual-use products. When a country had doubts, it raised an objection which should be respected by other delegations. In the present case, the Committee wished to be certain that the textiles exported would not be used to clothe the Iraqi police and army or the richer sectors of the population, to the detriment of the populations of northern and southern Iraq.]

ITEM[Other matters. Falsification of Committee documents]
TXT[Informed the Committee that the Jordanian Mission had recently brought to his attention copies of four letters approving the dispatch of goods to Iraq, purportedly signed on 30 November 1992 by his predecessor. Research by the Secretariat had shown that none of the letters in question was authentic and that they apparently represented an attempt to falsify copies of letters of authorization signed by the Chairman. In November 1992, the Chairman had drawn the Committee's attention to a similar falsification. A number of measures had been taken in the meantime to prevent such attempts and the case reported by Jordan, although it had occurred prior to the adoption of the measures in question, was a matter of serious concern.]

ITEM[Other matters. Question of documentation]
TXT[Stressed the need to reduce the volume of documentation and recalled that the Secretariat systematically circulated to the missions a copy of all communications received under the "no-objection" procedure. He therefore proposed to the members of the Committee that each delegation should thenceforth bring its own set of documents to the meeting, as was the practice in the Committee dealing with sanctions against Yugoslavia. The Secretariat would then distribute at Committee meetings only newly issued documents and documents of a substantive nature.]

ITEM[Other matters. Question of documentation]
TXT[In view of the objections to his proposal, the status quo with respect to documentation would be maintained. He pointed out that his idea had actually been to replace the current voluminous documentation by a status list of communications received under the "no-objection" procedure. The status list, one of which had been prepared by the Secretariat for the current meeting, specified for each communication the country of origin of the request, a brief description of the articles concerned and a reference to the objections raised, the approval granted or the placing on hold, according to the circumstances. The Chairman considered that such a document would facilitate and speed up the Committee's proceedings and he therefore intended to request the Secretariat to prepare one for each meeting of the Committee.]
